

LEADERSHIP INTEGRITY

Integrity in business is a choice. It's not always an easy one, but it's always the right one.

Honesty and integrity are things that are important as human beings in general and as part of being good citizens of a workplace. They are the unspoken expectations of being a corporate citizen. Things we expect others to emulate and yet we should never have to put in a handbook or on a wall – they should just be. They become even more important when we get into positions of leadership and even more so, in Human Resources, where we are expected to be the role models of integrity in a workplace.

When faced with critical moments of choosing integrity in business, there are five things I recommend you always keep in mind:

“Daring leaders who live into their values are never silent about hard things.”

- Brene Brown

For more details, refer to our November 2019 blog article at www.barrhrsolutions.com

